AFRICA S FADING ECHOES: TALES FROM AN ENIGMATIC CONTINENT (PAPERBACK)

Createspace, United States, 2013. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****. Mrs. Hasan always laundered her family s clothes early in the mornings, usually when I was brushing my teeth and getting ready for school. Sometimes, I even swished water in my mouth in tune with her pounding. Mrs. Jivraj s pounding was timid, as uncertain and mousy as her own self. It was as if she were afraid someone might hear the thumping and complain. The pounding from Mrs. Sidhu s house was the loudest. She did not care who heard and who complained. It was her wash that filled the air with the powerful scent of the blue bar soap she appeared to use in excess amount. I wondered if Mrs. Nathu ever got her clothes washed. Her ready-made frocks always looked crisp and trendy, as though they had just come off the racks at Harrods in London. One wet day, I asked Malini where she thought Mrs. Nathu got her clothes washed. Lady Macbeth, you mean? Malini chuckled, standing outside her home, holding her face to the rain. Mama Hatari, the terror lady? Don t you know? Her Highness doesn t need to get her clothes washed. She never wears anything twice! Huddling under an umbrella in the downpour, I, too, laughed as I watched in fascination at the droplets of rain clinging to Malini s eyelashes. Glittering like precious gemstones. With water glistening down her long, black hair and her chiseled face, she looked like a mythical figure out of an ancient text book. Now a few years later, in another country, I lean back in my chair, and there in the window, through the misty waters, I see her. I see her as she was then, her mouth...
